Convention, Mr. Mondale muted ome of the liberal tones that have narked his political career and, ac-moviedging mistakes that led the Democrats to defeat in 1980, ought to make the fall campaign a eserendum on the Republican reord and on the future.

"Tonight, we come to you with a new realism," Mr. Mondale said, ready for the future and recapturng the best in our tradition. We inow that America must have a trong defense and a sober view of he Soviets. We know that governnent must be as well-managed as it s well-meaning. We know that a him healthy, growing private economy ··· s the key to our future."

Admitting that "Ronald Reagan seat the pants off us" in 1980, Mr. Mondale told voters in a nationally elevised speech: "I heard you. And our party heard you."

But he harshly criticized the Reagan administration on defense and on its treatment of the poor.

You did not vote for a $200oillion deficit," he said, addressing simself to those who supported Mr. Reagan in 1980. "You did not vote or an arms race. You did not vote inglication the heavens into a battleround. You did not vote to savage Social Security and Medicare. You did not vote to destroy family 'arms. You did not vote to trash the civil-rights laws. You did not vote

In a speech interrupted more than 60 times by applause, he warned that Mr. Reagan, if reelected, would "sock it to average income families again and leave his rich friends alone.

Mr. Mondale hit the emotional high point of his speech when he challenged Mr. Reagan's record on nuclear arms-control negotiations.

"Why has this administration he asked. "Why haven't they tried? Why can't they under-stand the cry of Americans and human beings for sense and sanity in control of these god-awful weapons? Why? Why? He also promised, if elected, to end within 100 days of taking office the United States's covert but wellknown role in attempts to overthrow the Nicaraguan government. Mr. Mondale also used his choice of Representative Geraldine A. Ferraro of New York as his running mate to level another at-tack at Mr. Reagan.

"Tonight, we open a new door to the future," he said. "Mr. Reagan calls that 'tokenism.' We call it America." And he vowed to push for ratification of the Equal Rights

After the speech, in the kind of unity display that Mr. Mondale greater opportunity for all Amerisought, he and Ms. Ferraro were joined on the platform by Mr.

Mondale's erstwhile rivals, Senator
Gary Hart of Colorado and the day in a speech to the Democratic Reverend Jesse L. Jackson, as well as five other men who vied for the nomination: Senator John Glenn of Ohio. Senator Ernest F. Hollings of South Carolina, former Senator George S. McGovern of South Dakota, Senator Alan Cranston of California and former Governor Reubin Askew of Florida. Mr. Mondale's acceptance speech, six weeks in the drafting, included a series of promises designed to open the attack against Mr. Reagan. He charged that Mr. Reagan had misled Americans and said Republican policies had left the country in trouble.

The dock strike, which began without warning on July 10, paralyzed the country's imports and ex-ports and led to predictions of shortages and layoffs. Its goals were as vague as its impact was severe. Most recently, Senator Sam Nunn, Democrat of Georgia, urged that 90,000 of the 360,000 U.S. troops in Western and Southern Europe be withdrawn within five years if European members of NATO declined to increase their share of the burden. The proposal was defeated by 55-to-41.

West German and British leaders assert that their nations pay their fair share for defense. U.S. frustration with European and Japanese allies over military spending seems to have become more intense in recent years with President Ronald Reagan's requests for larger military budgets.

The Defense Department report says that "the total cost of Europe-an-deployed U.S. forces and all of the U.S.-based forces that we have pledged to contribute as NATO reinforcements over the course of a conflict" amounts to about $177

That would be 58 percent of the Reagan administration's initial military budget request of $306 billion. When the budget finally emerges from Congress, it is expected to total about $295 billion. The Pentagon cautioned, howev-

Asylum at Austria Camp The Associated Press

VIENNA - Four Polish buses that estensibly were headed to Rome on a religious pilgrimage drove instead to Austria's largest refugee camp, where 120 Poles asked for political asylum. Austrian officials said Friday.

The Poles, most of them between the ages of 30 and 40, were being processed Friday at Traiskirchen camp, about 25 kilometers (15 miles) south of here. Government officials said the buses reached the camp Thursday after crossing the border from Czechoslovakia. Sixty of the original 180 passen-

Mr. Litscka said that as many as 400 Poles a day asked for Austrian asylum in 1981 and 1982. Applications have dropped since then, to 1.823 for all of 1983, he said. Austrian officials reported an in-

Foreign Minister Erwin Lanc said Friday that 1.812 Poles asked to stay in the first half of this year, up from 380 in the first half of 1983. Austria began requiring visas for Poles on Dec. 7, 1981 — six days before Polish leaders declared martial law -- reversing a nine-year policy of allowing free entry for

With Tax Cuts for the Middle Class, Mitterrand Talks Business

By John Vinocur

New York Times Service

PARIS — Within hours of the Communist departure from the French government, President François Mitterrand began a campaign that seems aimed at creating the impression of movement toward the political center, an attempt to give French socialism the look of moderate social democracy.

Like a judge admonishing a jury, Mr. Mitterrand told Prime Minister Laurent Fabius and his new Socialist-led cabinet at their first meeting Thursday that "they represent no political party." Then the government announced cuts in corporate and personal income taxes - not just one-shot deals. Mr. Mitterrand said, but reductions that would become a pattern for the rest of

At a time when the country was listening for guidelines, there was no more talk of socialisme à la française, or the wonderful changes in society to come, or the politics of joy and selffulfillment. The warm, enveloping verbal embrace of the French left in 1981 was shed in favor of tax cuts interesting the middle class and knowledged Mr. Fabius's appearance of compebudget. From the Communist standpoint, the guard of leftists wearing bankers and managers' analysis was correct and a measure of how much Mr. Mitterrand seems to want to appeal to the center: the overall financial package, involving the tax cuts, is regressive in the sense that it involves flat percentage reductions, and makes up for the revenue lost by the government through increased fees for basic public services.

If some segments of the French left had previously described Mr. Mitterrand's policy of restructuring French industry at the cost of higher unemployment as benign Thatcherism, his fiscal approach now seemed open to the charge of supply-side socialism.

The other factor has the look of a political calculation. It is that the Socialist Party cannot fare acceptably well in the 1986 legislative elec-tions without broadening its support to the center. Although Mr. Fabius's cabinet is made up of Socialists and allies from two small leftist parties, there is some expectation that the government could be reorganized next year to bring in some centrists.

In its parting volley Thursday, the Communist Party complained about the lack of "tax everyone with the appearance of moderation, justice" in Mr. Fabins's plans for the 1985

> One of them, noted by Socialists rather than conservatives, is that the new government will have a difficult time speaking in a language meant both to appeal to the center and to what remains of the party's audience among the hard left and the underprivileged. For some analysts,

The short-term tactical answer to it appears based on the European Parliament elections in June, when the French Socialists polled about 22 percent of the vote. The results showed that they recuperated almost none of the leftist voters who abandoned the Communist Party. To regain lost ground, some Socialists argue, the party must look to the middle where it found the votes in 1981 that brought it to power.

Both the Socialists and conservatives appear to agree that the greatest potential source of pitfalls for Mr. Mitterrand is the Communist Party. Guy Claisse, political director of Le Matin, the national daily newspaper with the closest ties to the Socialist Party, said it would make no sense for the Communists to leave the govern-ment without trying to improve their electoral position by hardening their opposition to the president's policies.

In the next months, the Communists will have many opportunities. Beyond the possibility of encouraging strikes and demonstrations, the party can battle any Socialist attempt to rework a compromise on the abandoned bill on private reorganization as a surrender to conservatism.

The Communists can also fight the projected 1985 budget, involving major cuts in public spending, with the charge they are a callous rejection of leftist principles and the disadvan-

Sandinist Junta Relaxes State of Emergency in Preparation for Voting

By John Lantigua
Washington Post Service

MANAGUA — Nicaragua's Sandinist government, celebrating its fifth anniversary in power, has announced that it will relax its twoyear state of emergency in prepara-tion for elections Nov. 4.

However, opposition leaders said the concessions announced by Daniel Ortega Saavedra, coordinator of the ruling junta, were insufficient and renewed their threat to boycott the voting.

The revolutionary government," Mr. Ortega said Thursday, "has re-established the right to free movement in the whole country and the right of political parties to meet and hold rallies.

"The government also guaran-tees freedom of expression, only maintaining control prior to publication of information that affects our nation's defense [against] American military power.

His announcement came during celebrations marking the fifth anniversary of the overthrow of Anastasio Somoza by the Sandinist Na-tional Liberation Front.

In an angry and sometimes bitter speech, Mr. Ortega accused the Reagan administration of continuing the need for the state of emergency, which has been in effect since March 1982.

"Since the present administration has been in power" in the United States, he said, "we have been subjected to political terrorism. It must be said that they have imposed on us a state of emergen-

An estimated 10,000 rebels, financed by the United States, have been waging a guerrilla war against the Sandinist government for almost three years. Mr. Ortega said the Reagan administration and its rebel allies had caused 7,391 deaths in Nicaragua and had cost the country's already debilitated economy about $227 million. The Sandinists have said that the rebel threat made necessary the restrictions contained in the state of emergency. Declared after the first serious rebel attacks, the state of emergency provided for censorship of all media, outlawed outdoor political rallies and abrogated the right to free travel within the country and some guarantees of due process of law.

Opposition political groups. along with sectors of the Roman Catholic Church and business organizations, have asserted that the limitations are part of a pattern of Marxist-Leninist policies and have accused the Sandinists of breaking promises to establish a democracy after ending 45 years of Somoza family rule.

Paper Said to 'Fix' Weather Reports

The Associated Press

HARRISBURG, Pennsylvania - The newspaper USA Today published two-day-old reports of weather conditions, passing them off as forecasts in its new international edition, the head of a private weather service has testified in a federal court suit.

Joel Myers, a meteorologist and president of Accu-Weather Inc., also testified Thursday that in its foreign edition the newspaper twice reported forecasts for the previous day as actual temperatures. The service supplies the information for the newspaper's page of weather information.

The service has alleged that the use of inaccurate information had damaged Accu-Weather's reputation because the data were attributed to the service.

Attorneys for Gannett Co., USA Today's publisher, said outside court that the newspaper had stopped representing forecasts as actual temperatures and that other changes might be made.

Olympic Discrimination

In the name of opposing South Africa's could be no South African coverage. When the apartheid, the International Olympic Commitation and South African coverage when the apartheid Argus newspaper chain challes have been described as the could be no South African coverage. tee has barred South African journalists from covering the Games in Los Angeles. They happen to include reporters from papers that are outspoken in their opposition to apartheid. But there should be no political test for accrediting journalists - nor is there any for the 8,200 who have been approved. This ban offends the Olympic spirit, U.S. policy and per-haps even U.S. law. It should be lifted at once.

South African sports teams have been barred from the Games since 1968, when more than three dozen countries threatened an antiapartheid protest boycott. The ban continues because, despite progress in athletics, South Africa still denies all blacks the most elementary human and civil rights. But in the curious world of the Olympics, this disqualification has been extended to the press box.

Since the International Olympic Committee lets national committees accredit their own journalists but does not recognize South Africa's committee, it glibly decided that there lenged this exclusion, it got only a runaround - from the U.S. Olympic Committee as well as the IOC. Two South African television outlets - one controlled by the government, but the other private - were rebuffed by the Los Angeles Olympic Organizing Committee.

Dealing with South Africa and the passions its policies arouse requires many close, difficult judgments. But news coverage of an inter-national sporting event, like all other news coverage, should not be politically negotiable, and especially not on American soil.

The United Nations often bars South Africa's diplomats, but not its reporters. Although the Soviet Union and its allies are boycotting this year's Games, their journalists will be present, as they should be. To exclude the press of any nation is nothing less than to practice abhorrent discrimination. The Olympic committees have stained themselves and badly abused America's hospitality.

The Comrades Move Out

The Communist Party has now huffed out of the French government, charging that its former partners the Socialists are doing too little for the unemployed. But perhaps there was another motive as well. The party had good reason to fear that, under the Socialists' shadow, it was heading toward extinction.

For years, in election after election, the Communists had won a regular and reliable one-fifth of the vote, but in the past five years their base has rapidly shrunk. While the elections for the European Parliament last month do not directly affect the French government, it must have shaken the Communists badly to find that they are now down to hardly more than one-tenth of the vote. They apparently felt that they had to make a move, and, on the occasion of a reorganization of the government, they made it. They moved out,

That leaves the Socialists running the country alone. They have easily enough seats in the National Assembly to govern without Com-munist support. If there are mixed feelings among Socialists at this departure it is only because there is still a lot of sentiment invested in the ideal of a union of the left. But the union has collapsed before, and the two parties' leaders have never trusted each other. One important reason has been the Communists' refusal to free themselves entirely from Soviet guidance and interference in foreign policy.

Even before the Communists walked out, the government was much less leftist than in the first euphoric year after the 1981 elections. Its first initiatives, nationalization and rapid reflation, proved fiercely expensive in a time when most of the other industrial democracies were moving the opposite way. The Mitterrand administration saw the point quickly and began adjusting to it, generating great strain with the ideologues in both parties.

Does this defection leave President Mitterrand weaker? Probably not. A large parliamentary majority is of course better than a smaller one, but Mr. Mitterrand has been very skillful over the years at building strength by recruiting among Communists on his left and centrists on his right. Recruiting in both directions now becomes easier for him.

The real significance of this event is that, having served three years in an elected government, the Communists now depart by their own choice but visibly diminished in stature. Evidently increasing numbers of French voters have found that neither the party nor its ideas meet the requirements of running an advanced industrial society in difficult times.

Hollanditis in New Zealand

New Zealand, it appears, has a touch of Hollanditis. It is a partner in the Australia-New Zealand-United States treaty, yet its voters have elected a Labor government pledged to ban visits by nuclear-armed and -powered U.S. ships. Foreign policy evidently did not figure centrally in the elections, but the marks of a familiar political syndrome are there. New Zealand, like the Netherlands, is a small country with a tendency to feel that its security contribution is relatively small and that in any event it will be protected by America.

Secretary of State George Shultz, who happened to be out there, observed that ship visits are essential to the ANZUS alliance. He wondered what the alliance could mean without them. What, indeed? The visits are a form of presence, and they demonstrate that the treaty is in working order. New Zealand's voters knew this well. The Labor Party, moreover, is also pledged to rewrite the treaty to eliminate nuclear operations. The party's anti-nuclear ideology seems to run deep.

There is a reason, arising chiefly from its interest in global community and stability, why America would come under a heavy obligation to care for New Zealand in a crisis, even if New Zealanders had withdrawn formal military cooperation. The responsibilities of the United States and its various allies are not symmetrical. To grasp the point, try imagining that America had come down with an attack of Hollanditis. Still, in the political arena it is difficult to defend the proposition that the United States should help to defend a country that does not collaborate in its own defense.

In fact, the more immediately disagreeable aspect of the New Zealand vote does not lie in any prospect of the unraveling of security in that quiet quadrant of the Pacific. It lies in the impetus the vote may give to go-it-alone anti-nuclear or anti-American tendencies in the other countries - especially countries with strong social democratic parties - with which the United States has security ties. An alliance of democratic states can draw great strength from the continually freshened consent of its electorates. But New Zealand illustrates the risk. The problem then becomes respecting the will of a democratic people, while making sure they fully understand the implications of their choice. That seems to be the course U.S. diplomacy is on now.

Other Opinion

No Progress on the Falklands

Argentina's apparent sabotage of the direct talks with a Foreign Office team in Bern raises serious questions about the credibility of President Raul Alfonsin's seven-month-old government. Britain went into what had been seen as modest, relaxed and secret negotiations believing that an acceptable mechanism had been devised [to] prevent a squabble over the vexed issue of Argentina's claim to sovereignty, — The Daily Telegraph (London).

Britain and Argentina have been ratcheting away over sovereignty for decades. Time and again the Foreign Office and the Treasury sought to edge towards a deal which makes geographical and economic sense: time and again they bumped their heads on the unwillingness of the islanders (and their Westminster champions) to sanction any such process. We can hang on to our [Falklands] Fortress, of course, for as long as we have the cash and the resolve. But there will come a day within two or three years when the bedrock of British defense policy — in Europe, the North Atlan-tic and in nuclear strike capability — can't be afforded; when costly peripherals, like the Falklands, become desperate embarrassments.

It would be good - because in the end, summoning up some courage, it will be essential — if the British government could bring itself to talk openly and honestly to the islanders. That is what we promised two years ago. Instead, we have piled in the armaments and promises, disguising the long-term inevitabilities in a welter of short-term expenditure.

Beyond the Soviet Boycott: How to Save the Olympics

TT IS about time that some attention was devoted to the long-term future of the Olympic movement. Unfortunately, the leadership of the International Olympic Committee appears to have about as much interest in addressing this question as a Third World dictatorship has in free elections. The Eastern bloc's boycott of the Los Angeles Games is, of course, a major issue, and a lot of teeth have been unavailingly gnashed over it. But, while the boycott may illustrate one of the Olympic movement's larger problems, there is far more than that to address. The movement, and the IOC itself, must come to grips with a host of key questions that simply will not go away.

The most pressing question is whether the Olympic movement as we know it can survive repeated invasions by governments that want to make participation an adjunct of their foreign policies. Hitler's exaltation of Aryan superiority at the 1936 Berlin Games seems mild in comparison with more recent acts: the Palestinian terrorist attack at Munich in 1972, the 1980 American-led withdrawal in protest against the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, and now the Soviet-led boycott of the Los Angeles Games — a thinly veiled attempt to punish the Reagan administration for being so unreasonable about submitting to Moscow's aggressive foreign policy demands.

By William E. Simon The writer, a former U.S. secretary of the Treasury, is president of the U.S. Olympic Committee.

It has been my firm conviction that the purpose of the Olympic movement should be to provide competition for excellence among the world's athletes, and thus to advance international understanding and the cause of world peace. Those noble objectives are senously compromised, if not destroyed, when governments try to use the Olympics to score points for their foreign policies.

While it is unfortunately, impossible to eliminate government involvement in the Olympics, we should seize every opportunity to reduce it to a minimum. The Olympics do not belong to the world's governments. They belong to the world's athletes.

The U.S. Olympic Committee has proposed a compact with the Soviet Union's committee whereby we agree to resist any cancellation of events because of demands by our governments. (In fact, the USOC did resist President Carter's decision to withdraw from the 1980 Moscow Olympics, but once he made the decision we felt obliged to stand behind him.) Whether there is any breathing room at all between the Soviet Olympic Committee and the Soviet Foreign Ministry is yet to be seen, but we think a non-cancellation pact would put a far greater burden on governments that try to wrap their foreign policy gambits in the Olympic flag.

The late Avery Brundage, the longtime chairman of the IOC, was a crusty and controversial fellow, but he was also a man with the courage of his convictions, and he under-stood the meaning of leadership. Brundage got to the heart of the matter when he observed: "In an imperfect world, if participation in sport is to be stopped every time the laws of humanity are violated, there will never be any international contests. Is it not better to try to expand the sportsmanship of the athletic field into other areas?"

The IOC should also consider proposals to establish five permanent Olympic sites, where world-class facilities would be available for the Olympics as well as other international and national sporting events.

The IOC's member nations would then be asked to commit themselves to participate in the games at these sites, regardless of future political considerations. Such an advance commitment would make it far more difficult for governments to make last-minute political decisions about participation. If a withdrawal penalty were added, such misbehavior would be even further discouraged.

It is vital that there always be a choice among permanent sites. If the Games were tied to one country, the entire movement would be hostage to that country's politics in every Olympic year. There are no truly, permanently neutral sites in this contentious world, and it is naive to assume otherwise. Putting the games on a long-term sound financial basis is another imperative.

Currently, 80 percent of the Olympic budget is derived, one way or the other, from the Umted States, particularly the sale of the broadcast rights. IOC leaders frequently make indignant speeches condemning "com-mercialization" of amateur athletics, but they rarely complain about the burgeoning cost of

ROM OUR BOOK the vast international athletic bureaucracies that eagerly consume so much of the pro-ceeds. It is time they understood that the huge deficits that would come from banning "commercialization" would promptly doom the Olympic movement. The Los Angeles Games promise to be a spectacular model for privatesector support of the movement, and the IOC should build the successful aspects of the Los Angeles organizing committee's financing into a long-range program of support.

There are many other issues that the IOC has been unwilling to address in any serious way, including the absurd contradictions in determining amateur eligibility, the role of athletes themselves in charting the future of the Games, and the long-overdue enlarge-ment of opportunities for women to compete. The IOC fiddles while burning questions for the Olympic movement are left unresolved.

There is, in fact, a Commission on the Olympic Movement within the IOC structure. but at a recent meeting it chose to ignore the more important long-term future of the Olympic movement and instead focus singly and amplementedly on the implications of the 1984 Soviet-led boycott. The athletes of the more dead their coaches friends and fans the world and their coaches, friends and fans the world and their coaches, friends and fans deserve a lot better than this.

The decline of the Olympic movement would be a world-class tragedy. Aside from an end to the high-visibility quadrennial Games, it would bring a worldwide de-emphasis of amateur athletics, training centers, sports-medicine programs and opportunities for increasing international understanding.

It would diminish opportunities for millions of young men and women in 158 countries around the world to grow and develop and have the chance to excel in athletics and, ultimately, in life itself.

It would enfeeble one of the few movements in the world today that has been a powerful positive force in promoting the spirit of amity and brotherhood that transcends national boundaries, language barriers and political ideologies.

Unfortunately, that is exactly the kind of tragedy we are going to experience in the years ahead unless the members of the International Olympic Committee come back from lunch before it is too late.

For Southern Democrats, Gloom Lingers After the Fine Speeches

CAN FRANCISCO - On Wednesday morning, after successive nights of wrenching emotion, two Southern Democrats, a governor and a U.S. representative, were talking about what they and their party had just experienced

The speech to the convention by New York's Governor Mario Cuomo had been great, just what the Democrats needed, they both agreed.

And Jesse Jackson, their fellow Southerner, who had stirred such passion and tears, causing them to join in the swaying lines of hand-clasped delegates? They were more istoric even, they again agreed.

But then: "Jesse Jackson is destroying the Democratic Party in the South," the representative said. "I took a poll in my district just three weeks ago. It showed Reagan getting 63 percent of the vote, Mondale 21

"And I'll tell you something else. If you break it down along racial lines. Reagan gets about 90 percent of the white vote. My God, with that kind of split we could stand to lose a lot of even knock me off."

Less apocalyptic, but hardly sanguine, was the governor. "The trouble with Jesse is he's great at stirring emotion and raising expectations, but then he lets people down."

Bear in mind that these were not old-time white Southern politicians speaking, men with a separate-butequal view of race relations in their region. In national political terms, both of them are regarded as moder-

Such concern is not limited to whites. On the way to the Moscone Convention Center, before Mr. Jackson's extraordinary speech Tuesday night, a black I have known for 20 years stopped me. Once again, the Democrats were taking his support — and, by extension, mine — for granted. I was ready to hear him say: No more. No more. And yet I found myself close to tears of admiration when he rose above resentment with his incredibly moving speech: owning up to his errors, begging forgiveness, making no excuses and calling not just for a renewal of the black-fewish coalition but for its strengthening. But there was another part of me that was prepared, Samson-like, to pull down the pillars of the Democratic temple; a part that said that there are worse things than losing.

I had been hoping against hope that a way might have been found for the Democratic Party to take seriously not just the votes of black Americans but also their aspirations, that Jesse Jackson's historic candidacy had broken the old mold. It hadn't happened. The choice of Geraldine Ferraro as Walter Mondale's running mate pleased me, but it reminded me of other instances minority business loans and affirmative-action programs among them — when blacks had plowed the land only to see white women reap the crops. Nor was there any indication that things would be different for blacks the next time around. I am profoundly glad that Jesse Jackson, who must also have been torn, yielded to his nobler instincts, that he used the occasion of his speech to seek healing, to call again for struggle within the system. I think black America is glad.

But I think black America also

Why Not Jubilee Bonds?

With reference to the May 29 and 30 news analyses by Carl Gewirtz on Third World debt, and to reports on the rescue of Continental Illinois by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, a few conclusions suggest a solution to the problem.

It can be concluded that the U.S. government will not take the risk of letting the market adjust to a major bank failure. Third World debt was not the immediate cause of Continental's failure, but it makes little difference to the interdependent banking community worldwide whether the bad debtors are domestic or mostly foreign. A collapse of the banking system could cause havoc in all Western economies, and hence governments. tional /levald.Tribute N EW YORK — Fairfield Por-ter, the American impression-ist realist who died in 1975 aged 68, is being honored with a group of esplendent exhibitions.

One major retrospective, which was first shown at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and then toured the United States, is now installed at the Whitney Museum in New York. And the Whitney Museum branch in Stamford, Connecticut, in airy surroundings, offers a breathtaking survey of Porter as a portraitist. Brown Boveri drive and control systems look after the world's biggest water pipeline projects # in Saudi Arabia to supply more than 1000 000 m<sup>3</sup> of drinking water per day.

Advanced technology

A double pipeline 466 km long will carry 830 000 m<sup>3</sup> of drinking water daily from Jubail to the Saudi Arabian capital Riyadh. The first line came on stream in February 1983.

The pump drives, all supplied and installed by BBC, have a total rating of 430 000 kW. The variable-speed drives are of advanced design employing static inverter cascades, notable for their ease of control, ruggedness and low losses.

By 1985 another double pipeline 'only' 138 km long will take 330 000 m<sup>3</sup> of drinking water every day from the Shu'aiba desalination plant on the Red Sea to the holy city of Makkah and to Taif.

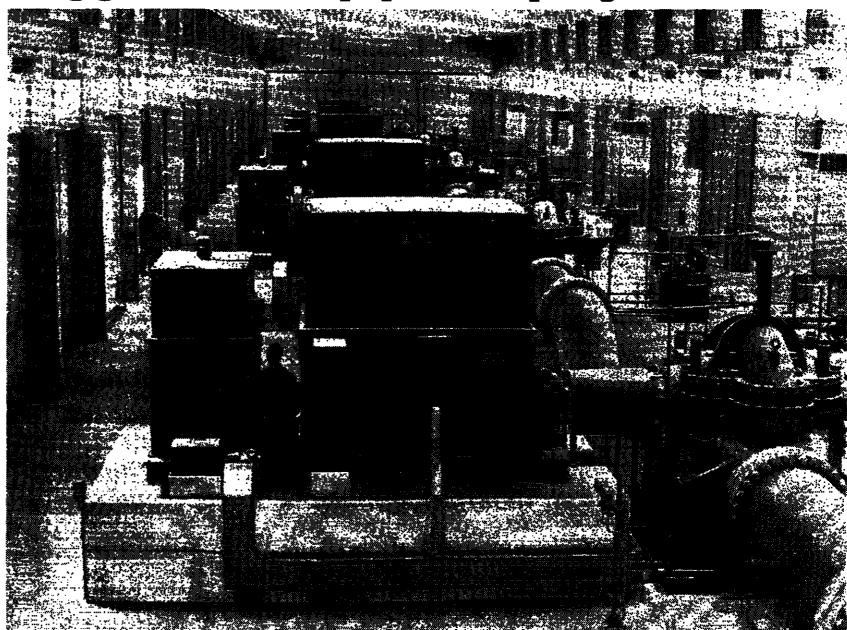

For this project Brown Boveri are supplying the entire electrical and electronic equipment: The variable-speed pump drives of course, and also the automation system with 3 process computers, high and low-voltage switchgear, transformers, the complete telecommunications and supervisory facilities, including telephone, telex and radio links, together with the uninterruptible emergency power supply, cabling and building installation.

It is the biggest single order ever placed for electrical systems for a water pipeline.

Brown Boveri play a vital role in providing the world with facilities for generating, distributing and utilizing electricity. Whether as main contractor, as head of a consortium or as consortium member, Brown Boveri are there. Accepting the challenge of the different, the complex and the new-every day and everywhere.

In committing their worldwide resources to the attainment of technical excellence in joint enterprise with others, Brown Boveri demonstrate their drive and control.

Pictures with a social meaning are displayed with U.S. Farm Security Administration and "Urbain — Trop Urbain?" photographs at the Espace Van Gogh, which in-cludes work by the Italian color photographers Luigi Ghitti, Abano Guotti and Mario Samarughi and subjective color portraits by Isra-el's Micha Kirchner.

Mérinos in the former church, Christian Caujolle, journalist and photo editor at the French daily Libération successfully conceived the exhibition showing the extremely rich way of using news pictures. The graphical presentation, one of the trademarks of the newspaper, is a mixture of headlines, print and photographs.

At the show are the pictures that the newspaper has used in the past few years, sometime printed on photographic paper and sometimes shown along the copy of the same photograph in the newspaper. As a result, we see that most of those pictures really do belong to newsprint, and that although the quality of printing is not the same, the sometimes grey picture in the newspaper — its proper context — has more impact and force than the glossy example that hangs on the museum wall.

Two years ago Leonard Freed, Guy le Querrec, Sabine Weiss, Jean Dieuzaide and Jacques Winderberger were invited to photograph Carros-le-Neuf, a small French town that was built recently in the hills behind Nice.

The blocks of apartment build-ings and areas of individual houses and their inhabitants are described with pictures and long captions. The pictures of the complex life of the community get their meaning only with the text, as in the one with a blind man at the balcony of that he "really enjoys the view."

In comparison to this approach of documentary and social photography, at the same showroom the well known pictures of the U.S. Farm Security Administration of the Depression were presented. So-ber photographs of poverty and suffering showed the distress of the farming communities. The captions served only as an indication of the place and the year when the pictures were taken. Walker Evans, Dorothea Lange, Russell Lee, Ar-thur Rothstein, Ben Shahn and others used clear photographic language that became classical with-

The catalog entry showed that someone felt that this desirable signature took some explaining. The entry, a small masterpiece of its kind, reads like a barrister's plea in

The commentary begins with the remark that "the present marble bust has escaped notice in the extensive literature on Rodin due to the fact that it has been in an English private collection since the beginning of this century." The col-lection, one may infer from a two line note, is that of a Lady Fitzgerald at Buckland House, Berkshire. Clearly in the thought that some literature on the subject should be cited in support of the attribution, the entry goes on to discuss "two specific references to a bust by Ro-din of this subject." One, we are informed, was made in a long-forgotten French weekly Le Courrier de L'Art on Aug. 24, 1882. It states that Rodin "has just completed an exquisite marble [carving]: a Manon Lescaut, head and shoul-

The second "reference" is the fact that in December of that year, a marble bust of Manon Lescaut was exhibited at La Galerie de la Librairie de l'Art, Paris. The source is not clearly indicated in the catalog. It is presumably to be traced to Alain Beausire, of the Musée Rodin, who is one of two scholars credited for the information condensed in the entry.

The other scholar is Dr. Daniel

Rosenfeld, of the Yale University Art Gallery, whose unpublished catalogue raisonne of Rodin's sculpture is cited.

The author of the catalog entry may be praised for having left no stone unturned. It noted that a tinted plaster of the "same subject with minor differences is in the Muste Rodin."

Finally, there is a sentence that can be understood to mean different things that "it retains the character of many of the busts which Rodin had produced in the mid-1860s-late 1870s in Paris and Brussels, but it is also typical of certain busts in this style, which he produced in the early 1880s such as 'Mme. Alfred Ross in the Musée Rodin, Paris."

Clearly, a careful demonstration was deemed necessary by Christie's expert to establish his Rodin.

The Rodin is very un-Rodin-like in appearance. Various questions. spring to mind. Could it have been produced in Rodin's workshop by a known to have happened on occa-

Banks Seem to Misread atin America Situation

By ALAN RIDING New York Times Service

IO DE JANEIRO — The cyclical expressions of panic and relief that emanate from the board rooms of major U.S. and European commercial banks suggest that they still view Latin America's debt crisis in the context of aminent moratoriums or short-term solutions.

There are the quarterly dramas of "will or won't" Argentina say its past-due interest. There is gloom over a Bohvian default and toasts to widening trade surpluses in Brazil and Mexico.

Larin when the region's debtor governments met in Cartagena, Colombia last month and optimism when no "debt-Restin', "Vianon les ors' cartel" was formed.

But the perspective from The sense of urgency felt here fed not by end-of-But the perspective from the region is, predictably, different.

"Back home they want to hear that

Brazil is doing well,"

The sense of urgency tent nere is being fed not by end-of-month financial deadlines that can somehow be juggled, but by the extending horizon economic stagnation. Short-term crises are barely visible in the long-term gloom.

one banker said. The very refusal of regional debtors to follow Argentina's recent militant lead reflects their belief that bursts of financial 'machismo" serve little purpose. But, coincidentally, a broader consensus is emerging on the need to find some responsible way of enabling debtor nations to recover traditional growth rates per proto the state of the state of without disrupting the international monetary system. Is the narrow prism through which foreign bankers view Latin America once again giving them a misreading? In the late 1970s they wrestled with one another to lend to — and profit from the region, giving scant attention to how the money was being spent. Now, as if ignoring the economic and political forces stirred by the debt crisis, they seem unconcerned about how this money is to be repaid.

The banking world's reaction to the situations in the continent's four largest debtors illustrates the clash between short-term and long-term visions: Brazil and Mexico are seen to be "doing well," applying austerity programs worked out with the International Monetary Fund and financing interest payments with exports; Argentina and Venezuela, by contrast, are regarded as "problem cases," reluctant to cooperate with the IMF and demanding recognition of their "special circumstances" when negotiating with foreign banks.

Yet, in the long term, the real problem countries appear to be Brazil and Mexico, not Argentina and Venezuela.

RGENTINA and Venezuela are, in fact, caught up in acute crises of financial management, crises of the kind that bankers readily recognize. But both have large reserves as well as enormous export capacities — thanks to oil in Venezuela and wheat in Argentina — which they can mobilize to cover debt obligations without convulsing the rest of their economies.

Brazil and Mexico, on the other hand, are more vulnerable.

They have larger and poorer populations. They have spawned huge trade surpluses mainly by cutting imports and sacrificing growth. They need continued infusions of foreign credit to resume growth but have become net exporters of capital.

Words of praise for Brazil and Mexico sound like due recognition when spoken in New York and London, but they take on an air of surrealism when read in Rio de Janeiro and Mexico City. Brazil is in its fourth year and Mexico its third year without

Among those who express frustration at the way Latin America is viewed from the board rooms of bank headquarters are the representatives of those same banks who are in the field. Living in, say, Brazil or Mexico, they soon become aware of the comnations to balance sheets.

Privately, they often argue that the banking community's approach to the debt problem is counterproductive, that quarterly and annual "rescue" packages and near-continuous debt renegotiations are postponing solutions even more than crises and that a daring new policy must be formulated.

Morgan Stanley confirmed
Thursday that the FDIC had retained the firm as its investment bankers, leading some analysts to conclude that other banks may be brought into the rescue plan

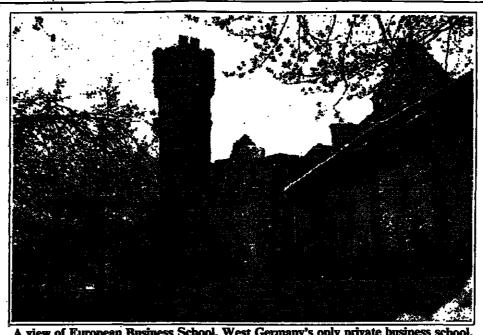

The firm served the FDIC in similar role in the rescue of First Pennsylvania Bank, a project that included the participation of other banks and has become the model for the Continental negotiations. A Morgan spokesman, Peter Roach, said he did not know what services the firm would offer the FDIC.

The investment bankers met Thursday in Washington with Continental and FDIC officials. Some observers say a solution could come as early as Friday. But an nouncement during the weekend early next week seemed most likely, according to sources close to

The FDiC apparently has run into some trouble in its search for a chief executive officer. Names of several prominent bankers or former bankers have emerged recently including E. Gerald Corrigan, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis; William S. Ogden, retired senior vice president of Chase Manhattan; Channeey E. Schmidt, former chairman of the Bank of California; Thomas Theobold, vice chairman of Citicorp. and Robert K. Wilmouth, chair man of LaSalle National Bank of

Bankers connected with Continental said Thursday that a flurry of rumors were increasing the bank's troubles. Morgan Guaranty, the lead bank in a consortium of 28 that is extending a $5.5-billion line of credit to Continental, called news organizations Thursday to deny that the banks had increased their aid to Continental by $4 bil-

A view of European Business School, West Germany's only private business school

Private Business School in Germany Is Providing Model for Competitors

By Warren Getler

nal Herald Tribune HATTENHEIM, West Germany - A medieval castle surrounded by vineyards seems an unlikely setting to discover the secrets of business adminis

But in this sleepy, wine-growing village along the Rhine is the European Business School, West Germany's only private business school.

Paradoxically, in a country that derives a third of its gross national product from exports, there has been until now only one school that provides a specialized education in business with an international perspective, along the lines of the Harvard, Stanford and Wharton graduate programs and the Thunderbird School of International Management in Arizona, also a graduate school.

The overwhelming majority of West German businessmen and women attend tuition-free universities run by the state, where they major in economics, business or law but do not enroll in a high-priced "professional school," as they are called in the United States. Some have gone outside of West Germany to business-education programs in the United States, Britain or to the most amous German-language business school, the University of Economic and Social Sciences at St. Gallen Switedand

The tide may be changing, but ever so slowly, as the success of EBS in placing its graduates in top international management positions over the past five years has inspired the creation of the Private University of Koblenz for Corporate Management, just up the river from the EBS. The Koblenz for the content of the conte school, scheduled to open Oct. 1, is to have 40 students in its first class, with a faculty of 12.

"Today we have three times as many job offers as the number of graduates, and these are offers from top firms like Siemens, Deutsche Bank and Morgan Guaranty Trust," said Dr. Klaus Evard, the founder and director of EBS.

Mr. Evard, 48, received degrees in business and economics from the Free University of Berlin, the Sorbonne and the London School of Economics. He has taught finance at the Sorbonne and at Middlebury College in Vermont. "Inspired by the efficiency of schools abroad," Mr. Evard said he (Continued on Page 9, Col. 1)

despite a late recovery attempt as Wall Street's big investors expressed concern about high interest rates. Traders also were disturbed by further signs that the U.S. economy was growing rapidly in a time of low inflation, which added to the uncertainties surrounding the Federal Reserve's credit policies.

The Dow Jones industrial average, down 7 points at midafternoon after falling 8.72 Thursday, shed only 1.55 to 1,101.37. But that was the lowest level since it finished at 1,086.90 on June 15. The Dow lost 8.50 for the week overall. The Dow Jones transportation average skid-ded 6.17 to 451.75, its lowest level in 16 months. Declines led advances 999-493, volume totaled 79.1 million shares, down from 85.2 million traded Thursday.

The early rally attempt faltered after the Fed drained funds from the banking system. Experts said the action was related to heavy borowings by troubled Continental Illinois Bank. But federal funds rates, which had fallen to 10 11/16 percent from 11 11/16 percent, moved back up to 11 percent following the Fed's action. That made many investors nervous that the board was tightening credit. Some traders had been encouraged by the central bank's report late Thursday that the narrowest measure of the U.S. money supply. M-1, rose only $1.7 billion instead of $2.5 billion some experts had predicted.

The bond market, bolstered by the report, was firm as inflation remained low.

Murdock Sells 5% Stake Grand Met In Hammer's Occidental

By Robert J. Cole New York Times Service NEW YORK — David H. Murdock, a leading Los Angeles businessman, has sold his 5-percent stake in Occidental Petroleum Corp. back to the company and resigned as one of its directors.

Neither side would comment, but people close to the situation said the only reason Mr. Murdock withdrew Thursday was because "he couldn't get along with Armand," a reference to Armand Hammer, Occidental's autocratic tive role in the company's manage-80-year-old chairman and chief extentive office;

In spite of the premium paid to Mr. Murdock, the transaction did not appear to be "greenmail," in which a company buys back its stock to avoid a potentially danger-ous stockholder. Mr. Murdock was bound by a 10-year agreement not to acquire more than 5 percent of the company, so he did not seem to be a great threat.

But he had shown repeatedly that he wanted to play a more acment and to speak out against Mr.

From Occidental's perspective, therefore, he was disruptive and thus it might be in the best interests he would no longer have a reason to remain on the board.

The company added in its statement that Mr. Murdock, 60, had kept his ownership of 734,330 Occadental preferred shares, valued at about $77 million, but that he had agreed to vote the preferred stock in favor of the company and had given Occidental the right to buy it back should he wish to sell it.

AT age 32. William Boyd has emerged as one of Britain's brightest new talents. The comic brio of his first novel, "A Good Man in Africa" - and the creation of Morgan Leafy, perhaps the funniest English bumbler since Lucky Jim —established him as a worthy heir to Evelyn Waugh and Kingsley Amis. And "An Ice-Cream War" — his second novel, which related the intertwined stories of several ordinary folk caught up in the madness of the Great War - not only ratified his easy grasp of irony and satire, but also enlarged his fictional terrain, demonstrating his capacity to also write with seriousness and compassion. Indeed Boyd seems singularly blessed with both an innate love of storytelling and the talent to render those stories in swift, confident prose.

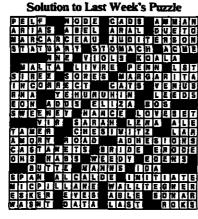

Many of the characters in this lumpy collection of short stories are also given to telling tales. The hapless Morgan Leafy, who makes a most welcome reappearance in two of the stories ("Next Boat from Douala" and "The Coup"), fabricates a wholly false identity for himself, in order to impress an eager stewardess: Without thinking twice, he conjures up "a large, interesting and cultured family, a trendy public school." "a modest private income, a chic pied-a-terre in Chelsea," "costly hobbies and recondite enthusiasms." Niles, the boastful schoolboy in 'Hardly Ever," uses heavy applications of the imagination to transform his innocent meetings with a gawky local girl into sweaty, impressively lewd encounters that enthrall his friends. And the narrator in "Long Story Short" exacts literary re-venge on his handsome, philandering brother by putting him in a story and making him fat and bald. For these characters, fiction-making is less an art than a strategy for coping with life's inequities and

Like Morgan Leafy, in fact, most of the characters in "On the Yankee Station" tend to see themselves as outsiders, as vexed, somewhat incompetent creatures, unfairly put-upon by the world. A few of them are actually out-and-out losers - an aging child-actor in "Not Yet, Jayette," who now works as a car-park attendant: a lonely, probably psychotic, drifter in "My Girl in Skintight Jeans," and a frustrated maintenance man in "The Care and Attention of Swimming Pools." Others are simply exiles, stranded in foreign countries or in the wasteland of adolescence.

"symbolic of the animosity of the Vietnamese peo-ple to the American presence." Clearly these two stories ("The Coup" and "On the Yankee Station"), along with two portraits of coming of age ("Hardly Ever" and "Killing Lizards"), are the finest in this collection. Not only are they long enough to demonstrate Boyd's gift for sustained narrative - the novel, rather than the short story, seems the form best suited to display his talents - but they also evince an assurance, an easy command of material and vernacular, that is missing in the other tales.

"Not Yet, Jayette," "The Care and Attention of Swimming Pools" and "Love Hurts" — which are all set in Los Angeles - do little more than perpetuate cliches about the sunny American West and its population of weirdos; and "Long Story Short" and "Bizarre Situations" employ the post-modernist technique of self-reflexive commentary to stagy ill-effect. "It keeps setting in the way, this dreadful compulsion to tell lies," reads one passage, "(You write fiction and what are you doing? You're telling

Unless used selectively, such techniques can often become contrived; and in Boyd's case, they are also thoroughly unnecessary. He's such a good storytell-er that the reader doesn't want or need any further comments on the text —even when they're from the

The incongruous attachments formed by these characters make for some truly odd couples - an Oxford student and a carnival "bat girl," a corporate vice president and a high-living California hippie — and they end either in predictable violence or, occasionally, in more surprising glimpses of redemption. For the most part, though, Boyd's people are not an overly introspective lot: Instead of looking into their own souls for answers, they tend to project their needs and frustrations outward to the world at large. For instance, when the military seizes control of the African country in which he is posted, Morgan Leafy takes the coup as another attempt, on the part of the world, to make his life even more miserable than it already is. And Lieutenant Larry Pfitz, the bomb-happy pilot in the title story, interprets the loss of his Phantom jet as

Suicide Spotlights Problems of Small People

By Ann Japenga

Los Angeles Times Service OSTA MESA, California Seventeen-year-old Michelle Crandall liked to wear high heels and skirts to Costa Mesa High School, where she was a junior. In her 1965 Mustang, a gift from her father, she patronized rock clubs on the weekends. She occasionally skipped school to sunbathe on nearby beaches. When Shelli, as she was called, hanged herself last November. friends said that it was because she was uoset over a recent car

Her father, Richard Crandall, believes the suicide had more to do with the fact that Michelle was just an inch over 4 feet (124.5 centimeters) tall. She left a note saving that she "just couldn't han-dle the life God gave me,"

"I'm not saying her short stature was the total reason she killed herself, but I'm sure it was part of it. How important is appearance when you're 17 years old?" Crandall asked. "How important is being different?

Both he and Shelli's mother. Marilyn, are dwarfs. He said his own adolescence was a time marked by a self-loathing that he has never completely shaken. For the last 23 years, Crandall, success despite his size. He graduated from the University of Hawaii with a degree in business administration, and went on to become a successful salesman. He worked for an industrial electronic company in this city southwest of Los Ange-

Neither Crandall nor his wife socialized with other little people. If you asked him several years ago if he ever had suicidal thoughts or depression related to his stature, he would have denied it vigorously, he said.

Only since his daughter's death has Crandall been willing to admit there are emotional and social problems that come with being

He says little people have been hurt by their own refusal to acknowledge their needs. The nation's largest organization for them, the Little People of America, is primarily a social group, he

There are no organizations aimed at changing public opinion or policy as it affects little people. according to Little People of America spokesman Charles Be-dow, who said that his organiza-tion does not consider short stature to be a disability. He defines it as "an inconvenience. After the suicide, Crandall said he sought out organizations for the disabled. He found that short persons are not included in these organizations and are not considered a minority, disabled, handicapped or disadvantaged.

Little people - estimated to number from 20,000 to 100,000 in the United States - are not eligible for assistance from government agencies solely on the basis of being short, he found, although they may qualify if they have ad-ditional physical disabilities.

Three months after Shelli's death Crandall quit his job to devote full time to organizing little people.

With his newly formed nonprofit corporation, Short Stature Foundation, he plans to conduct a census. The group will also lobby to have short people included in programs for the disabled.

Crandall said that short people need vocational and genetic counseling. He feels that he failed his daughter in not being able to supply such information.

After daughter's suicide, Richard Crandall set up foundation to aid "little people."

In addition, he said, short peo-le face unique health problems. His doctor: have told him he will require hip transplants someday. Among the complications suffered by short people are hip and spine problems, premature arthritis and spinal-cord damage, said Dr. Maureen Bocian, assistant professor of pediatrics at University of California, Irvine, Medical "There are many, many different causes of short stature — as many as 200 — and some are more disabling than others," said Bocian, who works in the division of developmental disabilities and clinical genetics. "Short-statured people want to be looked at as capable human beings; on the other hand, they do have disabilities. If you try to make both points, they kind of conflict with each other." For this reason, Crandall's plan has not received unanimous support from little people. He said many would rather not be thought of as disabled. "I would call that denial," Crandall said.

Both Richard and Marilyn Crandail grew up surrounded by parents and siblings of normal stature. In both cases, theirs were the first incidents of short stature children because of the possibility the child would be short, Crandali

But when Michelle Crandall was born on May 25, 1966, Richard said that he and his wife were elated, despite the fact their baby was indeed short-statured. "We felt that whatever happened, we were going to be able to get through it," he said. Two years later, Marilyn Cran-dall gave birth to a boy of normal stature, Michael, now 15.

Although Crandall said that Shelli never seemed particularly bothered by her short stature, it undoubtedly began to cause her problems as she entered her teens. Said Joan Weiss, a senior social worker at Johns Hopkins Medical center in Baltimore:

"The teen years for a shortstatured person do represent the most difficult period they go through. Being different during the teen years can be just devastating, particularly in situations where you don't feel good about yourself as a pre-teen. So often, short-statured teen-agers are left behind by their friends when they start dating."

During high school, Shelli began to tell her father of concerns about finding a job. Many of her friends were working behind the counter in fast-food restaurants, an option that was off limits to where her mother worked. Shelli knew her height was going to be a factor in any career decision, her father said.

The Crandalls separated three years ago — they have since divorced — and Shelli remained with her mother. She continued to be close to her father, who moved to a condominium in Huntington

Beach. He said they were able to talk about everything — school, cars, sex. Sometimes they even talked about being short.

"She had the same problem I had for a number of years," Crandall said, "low self-esteem. She didn't realize she was admired by people who knew her." It seemed to her counselor at Costa Mesa High that Shelli fit in well. Her size kept her out of organized athletics, and she was perhaps intimidated by youths her own age, so she sought out a crowd several years younger. Her friends were known for attending many social functions.

"There seemed to be an awful lot of kids around who cared a lot about her," said the counselor. He added, however, that this impression was formed at Shelli's funeral, attended by about 500 stu-

Her father claims the populari-ty was an illusion. "Shelli had only one close fiend. Michelle never had a boyfriend. To be a in the family.

Marilyn Crandall's parents advised against the couple having a cashier at Goodwill Industries, boyfriend — that's tragic."
